A computer worm is a kind of malware that is able to copy itself, and spread. Unlike a computer virus, this is done without changing files on a computer, and without affecting the boot sector of media. Worms spread over networks, or on removable media like USB flash drives. They almost always need a helper program that is able to access the network, or that executes when a new medium is inserted. In that way, a worm could start a program to send electronic mail, and send itself on to all the addresses in the address book of the email application. A very famous worm that appeared in 2000 was called ILOVEYOU (or Love Letter), it sent a simple mail with the subject ILOVEYOU, and an attachment of a document that contained the worm code.

A trojan horse (Sometimes called a trojan) is a kind of malware. It is special computer program that pretends to do a certain thing, but in reality it does something else, such as allow a stranger to access the computer and change it and read its information. In some cases the user notices, in other cases they do not. Spyware programs are current examples of programs that work as trojans.

It is rare to get a trojan on your computer by merely visiting a website, though it can happen. Usually, though, a trojan is attached to something you download. Usually they attach themselves to music, wallpapers, backgrounds, games, and especially executable files (.exe) and so on. It was named after the Trojan Horse in Greek mythology.

Telephone

A telephone is an electric tool. Using a telephone, two people who are in different places can talk to each other. Early telephones needed to be connected with wires. Now telephone calls can be sent with radio. This is called wireless or cordless.

Alexander Graham Bell was the first person to patent the telephone, in 1876. Early telephones were wired directly to each other and could only talk to the phone that they were connected to. Later, telephone exchanges allowed connecting to other telephones. During the 20th century the machines that made the connections were automated.

There are many different types of telephone. A telephone that can be carried around is called a mobile phone or cell phone. These became popular in the late 1980s. These days' people carry mobile phones and in some cities or countries it is unusual to not have one. Some mobile phones are able to make telephone calls using communications satellites instead of masts on the ground, which means people can make calls from anywhere in the world.

Computers can use a machine called a modem to talk to other computers over a telephone line. This allows a computer to connect to other computer networks including the Internet.

In most countries there are public telephones. To use one people have to pay with coins, a credit card or a prepaid card.

Most countries have a telephone network. In less developed countries cell phones are used as a cheaper and faster way to bring modern communications to the countryside.

4 Read the text and define if the sentences are true or false(1 балл за правильный ответ)

The word “hacker” is derived from the verb “to hack through” that means “to break through”. The word combines two meanings: one is negative – “hacker”, and the other- positive and is perceived as “master” or “expert”. While speaking about computers the verb “to hack” stands for two operations – to crack the system or to repair it. The idea of these both actions is the same – the mode, the computer and its programs work in.

The first hackers were the students of Massachusetts Institute of Technology (MIT). They were interested in creating innovative, stylistic and technically clever circuits. During the spring of 1959 a new course was offered at MIT – a freshman programming class. Instead of creating a better circuit, hackers began to create a faster and more efficient program – with the least number of lines of code. Soon they formed a group and worked out the first set of hacker’s rules, called the Hacker’s Ethics. The members of this group were engaged in writing and exchanging new programs and in perfecting the hardware. They worked at MIT’s Artificial Intelligence laboratory and over the years introduced many innovations: LIFE – a game about survival; LISP – a new kind of programming language; the first computer chess game; the CAVE – the first computer adventure and SPACEWAR – the first video game.

There are four generations of hackers in the history of computer revolution. Each generation made its contribution to computer technology.

The first generation hackers came into being in the late 1960s – the early 1970s. They were university students of computer science departments. Using the time-sharing mode these hackers converted general-purpose computers (mainframes) into virtual personal computers.

The second generation hackers refer to the late 1970s. Their names are associated with the invention and production of personal computers. Following the Hacker’s Ethics they opposed the commercialism of the Internet by creating programs and making them available to everybody, the so-called “freeware” or “shareware”.

The third generation hackers appeared in the early 1980s. They created a lot of educational, application and video games and programs for personal computers.

The present generation of hackers is the fourth generation. It is this generation that transformed the military Arpanet into a total digital world called the Internet.

But in the late 1990s the word “hacker” began to associate with the word “cracker”. Today it refers to the people who intentionally crack the access control and penetrate into other people’s computers in unauthorized ways. Such hackers read private e-mails, steal confidential information, misappropriate the program. They cause great damage to economics, business, banking and many other aspects of people's relations. Moreover, it is unsettling to know that a great deal of computer crimes go undetected and a lot of computer criminals remain uncaught.

- 1 Creation, use and spreading harmful programs for PCs is a criminal offence.
- 2 It was the first-generation hackers who made computer programs available to everybody.
- 3 In the early 1990s the word "hacker" began to associate with the word "cracker".
- 4 The second-generation hackers came into being in the late 1970s.
- 5 Modern "hackers" are only interested in creating innovative and technically clever circuits.
- 6 The first set of hacker's rules was worked out by the teachers of MIT.
- 7 There are three generations of hackers in the history of computer revolution
- 8 The first hackers stole confidential information and read private E-mails.
- 9 The present-generation hackers make great contribution to all the aspects of people's relations.
- 10 The word "hacker" only means 'master' or "expert".
